Transfer-printing techniques have been developed for transferring patterns from presensitized printing plates to printing stock using water and oil based inks. This process consists of applying the printing pattern directly to the stock using a screen or stencil with or without a frame. The equipment used for transferring a pattern to printing stock is called a press. The press is a combination of the following devices: a screen-printing machine, a dispensing system, and a transfer press. The screen printing machine consists of a hopper for a supply of stock (the web) and a printing head or squeegee, a transport system that moves the stock and printing head across a screen frame, and a squeegee drier. The dispensing system consists of a fluid supply line with a valve and a delivery system that pulls the stock through a hole in the screen. The delivery system includes a pump with a pressure gauge, a reservoir, and a vacuum line. The transfer press consists of a frame with four edge clamps that hold the screen in place, a frame and a platen with a printing head, and a print head squeegee drier. In many cases, the printing head has slots so that the squeegee is flexible enough to be drawn through and one side of the squeegee is removed and a pattern applied to the stock by the squeegee. The squeegee is used in conjunction with the screen printing machine to print a pattern onto the stock. A problem that occurs is that the squeegee will get stuck in the printing head and not be able to be drawn through the slot in the printing head. This problem is especially present with large squeegees. Many different devices have been attempted to resolve this problem including: a mechanical stop, a mechanical device that bends the squeegee so that it cannot get jammed, an electrical device that prevents the squeegee from being pulled too far, a device that incorporates mechanical stops that move a squeegee out of the way when stuck in the printing head
