* The game itself is very nicely presented. There is an electronic book style guide and soundtrack, and great voice acting and quality of animation. It's quite easy to jump into and pick up right away. * The background music is full of enthusiasm and energy. * The hero system is very fun to engage with. It allows for a lot of flexibility in your game style and is very deep. * The character development system is deep and helpful. * The combat system is good fun and fairly easy to maneuver, although there are some kinds of attacks you will need to practice a lot to get right. I've only been playing for three hours or so, but the combat sounds great. * The number of enemies you will face are exactly the number you'd expect to experience from a typical RPG. There's a fair amount of customization available, but also some fairly solid set content. * The game world is very large and open. * The graphics are done in a beautiful style. * The animations are truly outstanding. * The cut scenes are gorgeous and genuinely look like they are part of the game. The negatives, out of all these points, are minor. * The game will occasionally get very long and repetitive, as you might suspect, but that doesn't last long at all. * I find the onscreen UI a bit difficult to get used to at first. Also, there are a lot of options on the menu screen that you may not need. But once you get a sense for how to read it, it's very easy to navigate. * The game can often be a bit difficult to understand at times, although that's more because of the amount of information presented to you in the post-story than anything else. My problem is that most of the jar files (parts of the libraries) can only be found on the classpath when running from a directory structure like +--work +--... +---+--META-INF | `--Services | +--Developer | +--MyClass.java `--Services `--Security `--Developer +--MyClass.java Because of the nature of the project, the classes have to be available in a jar per environment, so I put the classes in work/services/security/developer/MyClass.java and in work/services/developer/MyClass.java. It works fine when running from work/Services/Security/Developer/MyClass.java. The problem is that I would like to be able to "compile" from work (mvn clean install), then run all the integration tests from work/Services/Security/Developer/MyClass.java, and finally run all of the functional tests from work/Services/Security/Developer/MyClass
