Quantification and modelling of phenolic compound remobilization in and from cell cultures of Hypericum perforatum. Cultures of H. perforatum cells were grown to analyse the in vitro behaviour of polyphenolic compounds. At intervals before, during and after changes in culture conditions, the cells were harvested and the phenolics were extracted, analyzed and quantified by capillary zone electrophoresis. The majority of the compounds present in the cell cultures decreased significantly after the first change in culture conditions, and rapidly reaccumulated. The analysis of the cell cultures, which had been subjected to a change in culture conditions, showed that the polyphenolic compounds were not metabolized and may represent a part of the total phenolics present in the cells of H. perforatum. The dynamics of changes in composition of phenolics were simulated and related to the pharmacological properties of these compounds. The concentration of most of these compounds measured in the cell cultures closely matched the published values in H. perforatum leaves and in the whole plant, from where the cells originated. The main result of this work was that changes in composition of phenolics during cultivation were very similar in the leaves and the cells of H. perforatum. This suggests that the cells can be used to screen and quantify the phenolics in H. perforatum cells grown in in vitro cultures and this can provide useful information on the phenolics in the plant that is grown in other media for the production of its pharmaceuticals.
