What we think of as "gaming" is actually a subset of a much larger category of the creative process, which we could think of as game design. This week, we explore an approach called Game DesignWorkshop, to show that design is not just what games look like but also what games think, and how players themselves become a vital part of their design. Also, I've been looking at what we'd need to create a game as a collaborative effort, and whether that would be a ton of different games, or more good ideas coupled through a common purpose. If you want to check out the website, the first chapter explains how the "DesignWorkshop" method is named and can benefit you, and how to find out more about it. As always, I'd love to hear what you think about what I'm doing, and how you could use these methods for your own creative work! Like and share with other people. :)
