Thanks Rob, it looks like you did a really thorough job and provided some great info! I recently purchased Photoshop CC as my go-to post-editing tool in Lightroom, and I really enjoy the way it integrates with Lightroom. I always found it a little difficult to stay on the Lightroom side when I was editing with Photoshop, but Photoshop CC may just kick-start the development of the new Lightroom. On that note, I am now interested in getting Lightroom Pro, as the price is right, as I plan to eventually start using Aperture, but I would like to have at least one tool in-house that doesn't rely on the cloud as my developments and revisions have a tendency to go a bit wonky. I gave Apple's Motion app a chance, mostly because it includes a workflow for processing and exporting your footage into a nice looking movie, but I was let down by how much hassle it was to organize all that so I decided to make my own video. Now I can export my footage from Lightroom and put it in Motion, or Adobe Premiere, or the next best option is to use VSCO Camstudio. I'd like to know what you make with it and how. Nicole is my favorite blogger at Abundance of Photography, and her post on timelapse and motion photography is an absolute must read. I was basically floored by the new 'Edition 3' of VSCO Camstudio on her website. Nicole's workflow starts with her shoot, moving to the post-processing process she's using VSCO Camstudio. Also, I must give big props to her for always setting some great shots up on Tumblr . Luckily, there are loads of other high-quality photographers who do amazing work. Here she is taking images of her kids and dog named Ziya, that she says are great examples of how to shoot lightning. Nicole also includes an example of a timelapse setup that she wanted to create a video from.

If you don't have anyone else using it on their computer, second, make sure to clean your computer after using it. If your images or other files get lost while you're using it, it will shred them, so make sure that you definitely save out any images you intend to save and use. Make sure that you have enough hard-drive room to store your files. Finally, you can opt to buy a backup drive to copy your images to. They are reliable and save you from losing your data in case of a file overwrite or error. Against the risk of using a flash drive or online backup that can overflow itself and potentially erase your files, you should have your own safe and secure flash drive that you can store your images on. It can also act as a second drive that is meant to be backed up and updated by a much safer method than any online. It is your safest bet to protect your work. There are cheap flash drives that will cost you from $10 to $15, but they are aren't a guarantee. What you get with your higher-end brand (I prefer and recommend SanDisk Cruzer) is a highly reliable drive that can easily store and backup your files through USB 2.0, USB 3.0, Firewire or even FireWire 400. It will also have a built-in light that will automatically turn on when the flash drive is connected. There are also opensource flash drives that you can find through the internet (you will have to read a manual for all of them to find the right one for you). With your flash drive in hand, look for anything that may spill over on it. A common mistake is leaving a product in a barbeque on top of your flash drive. It's hard to be too careful, but make sure that it stays in a safe place. 933d7f57e6

Adobe Photoshop has sharp tools for the experts who want to get their jobs done efficiently. If you want to use those tools efficiently while creating professional-level images, you can find the tools in the standard arrangement. You can still get it if that is what you feel is more comfortable. But you can also go for the new style of arranging tools. If you are an expert in using Photoshop or you want to save time, you can switch to classic arrangement of tools. Just choose the layouts 'Classic' or 'Toolbox' from 'Edit' menu and enjoy the change in the layout. Anyone who uses a graphics program should be aware of the layers function. This is necessary to use images or other elements that contain different components. If you have images with different parts, you will need to separate them to insert them. Select the layer you want to edit and right click on it, and choose 'Duplicate'. You can keep moving your mouse over to the new layers and click 'Edit' or 'Cut' or 'Copy' to create them. You can also change the colour of the new layer with choosing a new one and pressing the color bar button.
