Even though Photoshop used to be just about as popular as the PC, it's now a commodity, and Photoshop Lightroom ($99) is the software that almost every photographer uses because it's so well suited for flexible RAW editing. When I first purchased a Wi-Fi iPad Pro many months ago for my edit room, and then adopted more of a travel setup with the AirPods Pro, I was unsure if I was going to stick with Photoshop. By the end of the year, I was sold. The First Run app for macOS is the official app for Adobe Creative Cloud, but it is not for using Photoshop. It's for starting a website with a template. I've been told this is similar, but not quite the same, to services like Weebly and Wix. In reviewing the new feature, I was skeptical from the beginning. It created no value for me, and even though I use a computer frequently, I have never needed a real computer. Further, I have seen several situations where a tablet is a better solution than a laptop. One of the new features is called "second screen," providing a second Photoshop canvas for working on from the iPad app's screen. For example, you can make edits to an image on the iPad screen and then work on the same item on the second screen. Use the apple Pencil to adjust colors once, going directly to that stage of adjustment in any way you choose before you exit from illumination. The Pencil will always be the primary tool in most stages of editing, but items like curves and levels adjust to the Pencil's pressure. After using the Pencil once, you can continue on to keyboard strokes, or to a second screen, where you can use the Pencil as needed.

Therefore, when you make the edits, you can't see them and pass on any updates until you combine the edits to a new layer. In other words, the edits are tied to the layer you're editing. When you decide to redo the edits, you need to create a new shape layer to edit the item again. If this sounds complex, it will likely be in the beginning. Soon, you'll be your own biggest asset. Value in the image editor gets to be selectable and changeable. The value in Photoshop is represented by a color that calculates the strength that is applied to the pixels. In other words, the value ranges from black to white and represents the percentage value of that color in the image. For example, a person wearing a white shirt might have a RGB value of (255, 255, 255). You have to first create an adjustment layer and apply a Color Look-Up table (CLUT). You'll need to find a good CLUT that will suit your Photoshop experience level. Remember -- that most of this piece covers only the non-destructive features. The best way to create some wonderful looking images is to capture more images. You won't realize how fast and how much faster you can create images if you shoot more images as you will become more familiar with your own model/scene and will no longer be unnecessarily making the same shots over and over again. There is no denying that there is an inherent amount of talent that goes into every single image. The more you use your camera, the more you learn. The more you learn, the more you realize that if you need that shot, it was already done—and probably with better technique and better equipment than you do.

There's just no work-around for this kind of feature; if it's not half-baked in Elements, it's hastily designed. It's adored by designers, particularly those who do a lot of the pre-print collage work for print magazines and publications. If you're into photo retouching, then it's hard to find a better way to color correct your images. Photoshop features powerful tools that can make skin tones look more harmonized and smooth, and change images to make colors pop. You can use multiple presets or create your own and apply them through Photoshop's eyedropper tool. Elements users can choose to perform one color manipulation and then apply one of the windows they create (these are handy for those who edit right off Elements, since the windows don't need to stay open).
