The present disclosure relates to a hot melt pressure-sensitive adhesive composition (hereinafter referred to as "PSA") and a PSA-containing tape. A PSA-containing tape is widely used as a marking tape for a baggage, a tag tape for a baggage and a tag tape for a baggage used at an entrance and an exit of an airport. In these tapes, an important issue is a strength and a lightness of the tape. In the case of a tape for a baggage, if the tape is made thin in order to achieve a lightness of the tape, a strength of the tape is lowered to result in damage at the time of handling the tape and hence, there are problems in operation of a baggage and handling of a baggage. On the other hand, in the case of a tape for a baggage, if the tape is made thick in order to improve the strength of the tape, the tape results in heaviness of the tape and fails to be light enough to operate a baggage and handle the baggage. Accordingly, a tape having an excellent strength and lightness is required in the tape for a baggage and the like. As a tape for a baggage, one having a high adhesive strength and excellent adherend releasability after application of a pressure-sensitive adhesive has been hitherto proposed. For example, as the tape having the excellent adherend releasability, there is a tape described in JP-A-2003-223885. The tape described in JP-A-2003-223885 is a polyvinyl chloride resin-based tape and the tape is applied with a pressure-sensitive adhesive prepared by blending a polymer and a tackifier and then dried after coating of the adhesive. However, the tape is heavy in weight and has a problem in application due to a poor lightness. Further, as the tape for a baggage, one having an excellent adhesive strength and superior in bonding of a baggage to a baggage, a tag and
