Unfortunately, std::vector is preferred, because it can receive std::string by reference (or a function, see here). Is there a way to do this without using vector, by using std::string's copy constructor? A: You cannot call the constructor on a const element (c++11 only). You can either use a vector or you can just construct a temporary string on the spot with rvalue-to-lvalue conversion. Something like this should work: std::string s = std::string("foo"); std::vector v(1, std::move(s)); A: You can easily turn a std::string into a std::vector using its copy constructor: std::vector v(s.begin(), s.end()); .class public Lcom/xiaomi/account/opds/a/b; .super Ljava/lang/Object; # instance fields .field private c:Ljava/util/List; .annotation system Ldalvik/annotation/Signature; value = { "Ljava/util/List", ";" } .end annotation .end field .field private d:Ljava 04aeff104c
