As you can see, tabs have been introduced in the application, that need to be highlighted and a custom background can be set. Based on the colour selected by the user, the tabs will be switched and an image placed in transition. As you enlarge the image, the transition will follow with the image showing none of the image, just a fuzzy screen.

The application has also seen a complete overhaul of the project window and the way themes are handled. A new workflow has been adopted, and the new application will be available for all devices, which makes for a good deal for the iPad.

If you wish to switch themes, you can click on the new panel, marked with a circle; a script will appear to preview the theme. The preview will then be replaced by a preview image that has been selected by the user from iPad.

You can begin multi-window editing by dragging a window into another or by clicking the arrow icon in the new-window dialog box. Live Mask, the panel, and the layer menu all appear in a contiguous section on the right side of the window. Live Mask highlights just the controls that are active, as if those controls were not obscured at all by any other controls. Layer menus and tool panels appear just above Live Mask.

To understand the relationship between Apple and Adobe, we need to remember that the first versions of Photoshop were created under the leadership of Microsoft. Apple acquired the company in 1998, and shortly after that, Macromedia, which Adobe was then called, developed a web-based version of Photoshop under what was then called the PSD.org web site. Macromedia introduced Photoshop for web page editing (called Photoshop.com) in 1997, and was the first website for web-based versions. PSD.org also remains part of the Photoshop family of products, and is an umbrella site encompassing the web version and other tools. After the acquisition, Apple discontinued PSD.org and the other Macromedia web tools to create the tool as what's known as the iPad. Back then, Apple had limited knowledge about web pages, and the result was that the web tools that were never cleaned up. When Apple acquired Adobe, they became a much-welcomed improvement to the Macromedia development tool, but the web tools remained the same. e3d0a04c9c
