The purpose of this review is to examine the role of intravascular imaging in helping to understand the pathophysiology of restenosis. Intravascular imaging is currently being explored as a way of providing a less invasive, non-invasive, and potentially cost-effective means of assessing the degree of luminal narrowing following stenting. This technique combines intravascular ultrasound with spectroscopic analysis and optical coherence tomography for optical imaging. Intravascular ultrasound provides anatomic data for both stenting and subsequent restenosis. Spectroscopic and optical coherence tomography provide additional non-invasive molecular information, including cell signaling information. Intravascular imaging may help to answer some of the questions that remain in restenosis following stenting.
